The Media Faces Increased Threat

Program Highlights

Supporting and Protecting Journalists
A DRL-funded initiative provides trainings to journalists, media outlets, and social communicators on physical and digital security, as well as psychosocial care through hub centers in five regions around the globe.

The initiative builds and strengthens journalists and media networks, both nationally and regionally, to further develop a supportive and enabling environment for their work. From April 2013-April 2022, more than 6,000 journalists have been supported. 71% of survey participants indicated increased knowledge of risk mitigation measures.

Strengthening and Sustaining Independent Media
A DRL program in Central Asia trained independent local media and implemented small grants and tools to help them more effectively engage with their audiences on important community topics. The program also helped outlets build financial sustainability and expanded their knowledge of multimedia services, how to use these services online, and how to sell multimedia content.

An online news platform was developed to increase the public’s access to reliable and unbiased information which has increased viewership each quarter.

Combating Misinformation
A DRL program in a WHA country strengthened a network of journalists, indigenous communities and their leaders, and university professors and students to withstand digital attacks and disinformation in order to safeguard citizen access to fact-based information and provided an analysis of disinformation susceptibilities to the most vulnerable indigenous communities.

A network of indigenous organizations to combat indigenous-language misinformation was created and more than 30 indigenous journalists were trained on combating misinformation techniques and producing multimedia content for the local population.

Looking Ahead
Building on the successes of its media programming, DRL/GP media programs will increase focus on:

- Further promoting media literacy among key populations to counter disinformation and propaganda
- Increasing network development in journalist training programs to ensure sustainability
- Strengthening media institutions to produce and disseminate fact-based, accurate reporting
- Developing revenue-generating skills to strengthen financial sustainability of independent media outlets
